CASTLE HILL COMMUNITY GETS READY FOR A TOUGH BUSH FIRE SEASON

As more than 50 fires continue to burn across NSW, Member for Castle Hill Ray Williams has encouraged all residents who live near bushland and areas prone to grass fires to start preparing for the bush fire season.

Mr Williams said 'Get Ready Weekend' on 14-15 September is a great opportunity for families to get to know their local firefighters and find out about the fire risk in their area. Minister for Emergency Services David Elliott said NSW had already seen how quickly fires can develop and threaten homes and lives over the past week.

"The State's own permanent 737 Large Air Tanker (LAT) the Marie Bashir, which touched down just weeks ago, and has already flown 59 missions and delivered more than 880,000 litres of water and retardant.

"The first step to keep your family and property safe is knowing your bush fire risk, which your local brigade can help you assess.

"RFS volunteers are an invaluable source of knowledge and can provide advice on preparing your bush fire plan, preparing your property and planning with neighbours."

This weekend RFS volunteers will host more than 600 events, including demonstrations, workshops and displays, at brigade stations and community events.

NSW RFS Deputy Commissioner Rob Rogers said recent research showed that 67 percent of people living in bush fire prone areas have some sort of plan for what to do during a fire, but it is worrying that a third of people have not even talked about it.

"Research shows that while two thirds of people surveyed acknowledged that it is their responsibility to get ready for bush fires, nearly half of people have not taken any steps to protect their home," Mr Rogers said.

"With 95 percent of NSW drought affected and a forecast of ongoing dry and warm conditions, we're facing a potentially long bush fire season – so now is the time to get ready."
